

A 20x20 grid heatmap visualization. The grid is composed of small squares, each colored in a shade of red. The color intensity varies, with the darkest red (representing the highest density or value) concentrated in the center of the grid, specifically in the middle rows and columns. The color gradually transitions to lighter shades of red towards the edges of the grid, indicating a radial or Gaussian-like distribution of the data being represented.

